

Dr. Ninan currently serves as the Dean and Chief Academic Officer for the Kansas College of Osteopathic Medicine. Before assuming this position, he was the assistant dean for curriculum, innovation, and education. In that capacity, Dr. Ninan worked closely with our faculty to develop a first-rate medical curriculum that prioritizes innovative approaches to patient care, diagnostics, and the incorporation of new medical technologies.

Before working in undergraduate medical education, he spent a number of years supporting anesthesia residency training programs, where he currently still serves on the Accreditation Council for Graduate Medical Education's Review Committee for Anesthesiology.

In addition to his work in medical education he has served in all degrees of medical leadership including department chair, medical director of perioperative services, and the president of a medical staff. Over the course of his professional life he has taught career development and business concepts to physicians of all different specialties.
